

Before you consider starting your own graphic design business, you will probably want to get some formal training in design and graphic arts. When you evaluate training, try to have a specialty in mind (web-centric, print production, etc.), but start with the basics. Times have changed, and so have the tools.

Never forget that knowing how to use the software doesn't make you a good designer. A fundamental understanding of design ideals is a good start, as well as something that deals with design aesthetics. From there, you venture into the tools of the trade—typography, font management, basic prepress, QuarkXPress, Photoshop, Illustrator...

GRAPHICS EDUCATORS

If you decide to specialize in web design or programming for the web, make sure you research the software carefully. For print, look for a good digital prepress course or print preparation course that includes basics on trapping, imposition and color correction.

Keep researching your field. And never be afraid to ask for help.

And finally, something you must consider is taking the time to understand your Mac or PC. Even experienced designers need updating every once in a while. Never be afraid to go back to school. Graphic design is part of an ever-changing industry.
